In fact, you could argue that it's more prevalent than saying sorry for that. Another common phrase is sorry about that. You could also make the case that saying sorry for that indicates that you might be accepting some of the blame for the bad consequences, whereas saying sorry to hear that would only ever indicate that you are consoling someone.

"I'm sorry to hear that" vs "I'm sorry for that" as a response

"I am sorry that happened" doesn't really make much sense to me as the person had no role whatsoever in the happening of event. But "I am sorry to hear that" is more like saying "sorry to have made you remember a painful memory". This seems like a more understandable response.
