however, the watch as an object helps us to appropriate time: just as the automobile "eats up" miles, so the watch-object eats up time.<sup>25</sup> By making time into a substance that can be divided up, it turns it into an object to be consumed. A perilous dimension of praxis is thus transformed into a domesticated quantity.

The everyday environment remains to a very great extent an 'abstract' system. The result is that each object added to the sum of objects may be adequate to its own function but work against the whole. and the way the rationality of objects comes to grips with the irrationality of needs. It is this disturbance.
